They might say, in deference to his supposed ability: "Professor, you will have to go out of court; the case has gone against you; but should you find what you are in search of, you may commence suit anew, for your case is dismissed, without prejudice," as the lawyers would say." The idea passed through my poor mind that the doctrine of evolution was illogical and ridiculous: for, if it were true, apes would now be lous; for, if it were true, apes would now be seen every day turning to men, and skeletons of such would be found in every geological formation of the world. Why not? If apes ever have turned to men, why are they not turning to men now? If the doctrine be true, would the human race not be like the orange turning to men now? If the doctrine be true, would the human race not be like the orange tree in a congenial climate, which has at all times blooms, green fruit, half ripe and fully ripe oranges. Mr. Huxley cardidly acknowledges that he does not accept Darwin's theory fully. He says it is true "that in structure there is as great a difference between the highest and the lowest race of men, as between the lowest order of men and the highest order of apes;" but he is much troubled in his mind by the fact "that distinct species are incompetent to breed with one another: or if they do breed, the resulting mule, or hybrid, is unable to perpetuate its race, with hybrid, is unable to perpetuate its race, with another hybrid of the same kind." Now, I assert this: The birden of proof that it ever has been done since the foundation of the world rests on the objector. Not a single instance can be produced; the link is missing. Hutley even waits for proof that new species can be produced by selective breeding; and therefore we are warranted in maintaining our position and still believing, first, that God made the beasts without souls or consciences, and with just enough intellect to provide for their wants; for instance, he endowed the highest ape with just enough sense "to construct his nest."
